Study: "Top 10 Rule" working, but slowly

A new study shows a law aimed at increasing minority enrollment at state schools is working, but slowly.

The "Top 10 Rule" allows for the automatic admission of high school students who graduate in the top 10 percent of their class.

Last year, 65 percent of the incoming class was made up of students coming in under the rule, but only about four percent of them were African American.

The study was done by a former graduate student and published in the Chronicle for Higher Education.
